

COPYING textbooks - WHAT IS ALLOWED?

Illegal copying of textbooks is becoming more and more widespread. It happens for instance by putting a PDF copy of a book on Facebook, Drop Box or sending it to classmates via email. Other examples are websites that sell illegal digital copies. Illegal copying will eventually result in your textbooks becoming more expensive and ultimately cease to be published because there is no basis for writing them.

Illegal copying is a criminal offence. Therefore it is important that you as a student are aware of the rules that apply to copying textbooks. Knowing the ins and outs of the rules for copying of printed books and e-books can be complicated, so we have listed the most important rules here:

When can you copy an e-book?

If you have purchased an e-book, you can make copies for yourself or for your household. This means that you are allowed to make a digital copy and, for example, give your cohabitor access to it. However, you cannot share an e-book with others outside your household such as friends, classmates, internet groups, etc. Your household does not include the residents of your hall of residence either.

It is, of course, under the condition that you have purchased the e-book lawfully, and you cannot copy an e-book that you have borrowed at the library.

When can you copy a printed book?

You can copy a printed book, but only for private use, i.e. for yourself or for your acquaintances. You may only copy it in 1-2 copies. If you copy only a few pages, you may take up to 5-6 copies of each page.

However, if you choose to scan the book, the same rules apply as for copying e-books, i.e. that only you and members of your household may use the scanned copy.

You are not allowed to use a copy shop to make copies of textbooks. In copy shops you may only copy works produced by yourself or works of others, if they have given you a specific permission to do so.

Can I make copies of content on websites?

The content on websites is protected by copyright. Therefore, you cannot simply copy text, sound, or pictures from a website. This kind of copying is only allowed if it is for private use in your household, or if the website owner expressly states that the page content may be copied (i.e. under a creative common license). Therefore, you cannot legally share content from online learning tools or reference books that you have purchased a license for or gained access to through your studies.

Did you know that your paper is also protected?

When you write a paper, it is automatically protected by copyright. This means that your paper may not be copied by others unless you allow them to do so.

You can find out more about the rules for copying on the website of the Ministry of Culture: <http://kum.dk/> (But first you will have to improve your Danish language skills ;-)

www.ubva.dk

DANSKE FORLAG
Danish Publishers

www.danskeforlag.dk